This is a wonderful game. I wasn't really around when games of this kind were the next big thing in gaming, but my dad played Meridian 59 when it first came out, and I've been able to try out the fan server for Meridian that's still running today.

There's something really charming about those early attempts at 3D from the 90's, and more importantly there's something that was lost in the RPG genre that those games did very well- exploration. I'm not sure exactly what it is, maybe the scale of the game or no-hand-holding approach to questing that these old games had, but you really get the sense that any NPC you walk up to could really have something of value to say to you- maybe a quest, or a bit of gossip that tells you something important about other important characters in the area.

There's something that feels really good about the fact you can completely ignore the main quest and proceed to walk into town stealing things, that you can learn any spell or weapon art if you put in the time to train up your attributes and find the right items.

That's what was good about RPG's, and somehow gaming culture just completely misunderstood that and took the direction of using Diablo as the blueprint, where it was all just about the carnage, explosions, and action.

The Quest gives you a window into that old world of Roleplaying Games without all the clunkiness that old games would have were you to pick them up today- which is exactly what an old-school revival game should be.. I appreciate and enjoy how much detail is put into the individual quests in this game. I felt like I was living out an old school fantasy novel. The art style paired with the music captivated me fully. I was so engrossed in this beautiful fantasy world and really enjoyed my stay. Tons of fun to be had on this adventure and I really sunk my teeth into it! Excellent game.
